

|                          |                              |                            |
|--------------------------|------------------------------|----------------------------|
| The first day arrives    | As time progresses           | With nature's march        |
| The time anew sets about | Full of love's sweet jubilee | The earth issues abundance |
| Followed by the next     | To be soon replaced          | With colorful life         |

---

|                             |                           |                          |
|-----------------------------|---------------------------|--------------------------|
| Rain falls from above       | With colors brought forth | Near the half-way point  |
| Mixed into life's nutrients | Now its energy abounds    | Evolving toward the peak |
| Bursting from calm graves   | Existence in swing        | At maximum growth        |

---

|                              |                           |                          |
|------------------------------|---------------------------|--------------------------|
| Arise! – the sun's warmth    | Golden light above        | As leaves fall to earth  |
| Its rays heat those below it | To summon nature's colors | Preparing for transition |
| Bringing comfort now         | Life and death dance on   | From warmth into cold    |

---

|                             |                         |                             |
|-----------------------------|-------------------------|-----------------------------|
| Cool air filling lungs      | The time almost gone    | Hark! Time is fleeting      |
| In/out, all is synchronized | Reflecting sans avarice | As the curtain call arrives |
| As the end draws near       | As time moves onward    | To become final             |

This modular poem (in Haiku style) can be read in any order: stanza by stanza, left to right, backwards, and at random intervals. Without repeating any individual stanza, if you read all 12 stanzas in their complete form, you will have over 479 million variations to read and enjoy.